Introduction

The police are the gatekeepers of the criminal justice system. When an offence occurs, the police investigate and, when the circumstances of the case justify a prosecution, are responsible for the submission of case files to the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS). The CPS is responsible for prosecution decisions about the case and presenting the evidence in court.

Frontline¹ police officers investigate the majority of cases dealt with by the criminal courts. Dealing with victims and witnesses is an important part of these officers' work. If victims or witnesses are vulnerable² this may affect their ability to attend court and give evidence. It is therefore essential that officers identify accurately the vulnerability of victims and witnesses in the case files they submit to the CPS, so that:

- the court is given accurate information of the circumstances of the case, particularly when determining sentence;
- risks to victims and witnesses are identified to the court; and
- victims and witnesses are able to give their best evidence.

In a criminal trial, an officer should consider making an application for special measures³ or other suitable arrangements to help victims and witnesses give their best evidence (for example, elderly or disabled people may need to sit down to give their evidence in court). It is the responsibility of the police to assess the victim or witness need for special measures and for the CPS to make the application to the court. It is important therefore that the police provide the CPS with the required information to enable the prosecutor to explain to the court what special measures are required and why this is the case.

¹ Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary defines frontline police officers as those members of police forces who are in everyday contact with the public and who intervene directly to keep people safe and enforce the law.

² For the purpose of this inspection, vulnerability applies to the following categories of victim or witness: young (under 18); elderly; disabled; suffer from mental health issues; have learning difficulties; have another form of vulnerability (e.g. in fear of intimidation); or a mix of these.

In this inspection we examined these issues in depth, using the National File Standard⁴ (NFS) as a basis for identifying whether officers had adequately assessed the needs of victims and witnesses in the preparation of case files. The NFS sets out the standard for case file preparation to ensure that the right information is incorporated into the files at the right time.

In some cases, the vulnerability of victims or witnesses may be key evidence if it was relevant to, or an aggravating factor in the offence. The NFS states that key evidence is:

"that evidence which either alone (the evidence of one witness) or taken together with other evidence (further witnesses or exhibits) establishes the elements of the offence to be proved and that the person to be charged committed the offence with any necessary criminal intent."

To fulfil the requirements of the NFS, every case file prepared by the police must include a report setting out the details of the case. This is known as the police report. We have examined these police reports to determine whether there is sufficient information for the prosecutor to inform the court of the circumstances of the case. In accordance with the NFS, the police report must include a summary of:

- the key evidence in the case; and
- the interview with the defendant.⁵

The NFS requires, in all cases, that a supervisor certifies that the information in the police report is an accurate summary of the available evidence in the case and the report has been prepared in accordance with the required standard.

When investigating an offence, a police officer will usually ask a witness to make a written statement about what happened. All witness statements include a section entitled 'witness care'. It is here that the officer is required to record information about the needs of vulnerable and intimidated witnesses. We have examined whether officers recorded this information correctly.

⁵ A defendant may not always be interviewed. For example, if a police officer witnesses an offence of disorderly conduct the defendant is not routinely interviewed regarding his/her conduct.

This is the third in a series of inspections of case file quality conducted jointly by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC) and Her Majesty's Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate (HMCPsi).⁶ In this inspection HMIC examined practice in all police forces in England and Wales. In this report, we set out our findings for Dyfed-Powys Police.

We are also publishing a national thematic report which will draw together findings from the individual force reports to identify key themes, and highlight effective practice and areas for improvement across the police service as a whole.

The inspection approach

This inspection examines the effectiveness of police in providing accurate information of the circumstances of the case, identifying the vulnerability of victims and witnesses, and assessing and managing risks so that their needs are met effectively.

HMIC examined ten finalised⁷ police case files from each force.⁸

Five of the case files selected involved offences where the victim or witness may have been vulnerable by reason of the circumstances of the offence:

- two cases of domestic violence/sexual offences;
- two cases of racially and/or religiously aggravated offences; and
- one case involving a homophobic offence.

The other five cases were selected solely on the basis of offence type where the involvement of vulnerable victims or witnesses was not necessarily to be expected. These offences include, for example:

- assaults;
- burglary;

⁷ These are defendant cases charged or summonsed whose case was completed in the magistrates' courts or in the Crown Court between June and August 2014.

⁸ With the exception of the Metropolitan Police Service where inspectors examined 40 finalised police case files.

- robbery; and
- public order.⁹

About the force

Information about Dyfed-Powys Police is available from HMIC's website, at: www.justiceinspectors.gov.uk/hmic/dyfed-powys

Training provided on case file preparation

The College of Policing sets standards of professional practice for the police service. This includes designing the national syllabus for the Initial Police Learning and Development Programme for new recruits. Each force is required to provide the two-year programme which normally includes 35 weeks of classroom learning and practical on-the-job training. One module of the syllabus relates to case file preparation to be carried out in the classroom and, during the on-the-job phase of the training programme, new recruits prepare a case for court. In addition, the College has produced a 70-minute interactive e-learning training course on case file preparation. This course is available to all police officers and police staff via the National Centre for Applied Learning Technologies.

In this force new police recruits receive case file preparation training in accordance with the national syllabus for new recruits provided by the force's training department. Their learning continues during their workplace assessment with a trained tutor constable.

In 2011, Dyfed-Powys Police provided refresher training in file management and supervision to all staff, including sergeants. Since 2012, the force has provided additional file preparation training to all sergeants as part of their attendance at leadership seminars.

All operational officers up to the rank of inspector, and interview support teams, have completed training on the force's new electronic case file management system.

Currently, all staff identified as requiring further guidance and development receive support from the force's central file preparation unit.

⁹ The Public Order Act 1996 includes a number of offences. The most common of these offences, dealt with by police include: section 3 – affray, section 4 – causing fear or provocation of violence, and section 5 – disorderly conduct.

Findings

We examined ten case files in each force. Our findings are presented in two parts. The first section relates to the overall quality of the case files examined and their compliance with the NFS. The second section focuses on the vulnerable victims and witnesses involved in these cases.

File quality

In the two previous thematic joint inspections of case file quality, we found that the police were more effective at summarising the defendant's interview than the key evidence. Both these sections of the police report provide important information for the prosecutor. However, it is in the summary of key evidence where the circumstances of the case and relevant issues affecting key witnesses are explained. It is important, therefore, that all the relevant information is summarised in the correct section of the police report. This will support the prosecutor's review of the case file and enable them to present the evidence to the court more effectively.

The results for Dyfed-Powys Police are set out in the table below:

| Quality of the police report | Number of cases |
|---|------------------------|
| In how many cases was the summary of key evidence adequately presented in the police report? | 8/10 |
| In how many cases was the summary of the interview adequately presented in the police report? | 6/9* |

In one case involving a minor offence of disorderly conduct, there was no requirement to interview the defendant

HMIC considered that eight of the ten case files contained an adequate summary of key evidence in the police report. In two of the cases the summaries were not succinct.

HMIC saw evidence that the police had copied information from a confidential document in the case file into the police report. This practice risks inaccurate or incomplete information being included in the summary of evidence. There is also a risk that this practice could result in confidential information being inadvertently disclosed to the defence.

HMIC considered that in six of the nine relevant cases involving interviews, the case files contained an adequate summary of the interview. In three of the cases the summaries were not succinct. This information would have assisted the prosecutor in presenting the case to the court.

In six of the ten case files examined the certification of the police report by a supervisor was completed correctly.

Witness care information

In one of eight applicable¹⁰ cases, the witness care information was completed correctly and available for the information of the court.

In seven cases, HMIC was not able to establish whether the witness care information was available for the court. However, at the time of our inspection Dyfed-Powys Police used a witness list which had been amended to include some of the witness care information. This form (known as an MG10) does not include all of the information found on the back of the victim statement, or any information about witness consent and victim care. HMIC was told that the force had recently changed its procedure so that this information was more readily available to the witness care unit.

Identifying vulnerability

In this section, we focus on the journey of victims and witnesses through the criminal justice system. Officers must identify accurately the vulnerability of victims and witnesses to the prosecutor so that the court receives accurate information of the circumstances of the case from the prosecutor. For example, if an elderly woman is targeted and robbed because of her age or disability, it is essential that the police include this information in the case file.

Did the police provide accurate information to the prosecutor of the circumstances of the case?

We found that vulnerable victims or witnesses were involved in four of the ten cases. In two of the cases, the police identified correctly the vulnerability of the victim or witness in the case file. In three cases victims were vulnerable because they feared reprisals and intimidation from the defendant; one victim was vulnerable due to their young age.

¹⁰ HMIC defines applicable as cases where a witness statement is required. Cases involving police witnesses only do not require witness care information. There are two such cases in this force.

As the case progresses, risks to victims and witnesses must be identified to the court and these risks must be managed to ensure victims and witnesses are able to give their best evidence. For example, a rape victim who is afraid of the defendant may need special measures – such as giving evidence from behind a screen or via 'live link'.

Alternatively, the police may manage the risk to the victim or witness by imposing conditions to restrict the movements of the defendant in order to reduce the risk to the victim. For example, police may impose a curfew or other conditions on the defendant.

Did the police identify the risk(s) to the vulnerable victim(s) and key witness(es) to the court and, where applicable, manage that risk?

The police identified correctly the risk of harm to the victim or witness in two of the four cases, and in one of these cases subsequently managed that risk. This included imposing appropriate bail conditions on the defendant prior to release from police custody.

Did the police enable the victim(s) and key witness(es) to give their best evidence?

The police requested special measures or enhancements to ensure that the victim or witness could give their best evidence in two of the four cases where the vulnerability and risk of harm to the victim or witness were identified. There were two cases where special measures should have been considered, but were not. In one of these cases the vulnerability of a 17-year-old witness to a hate crime was not identified initially by police. Her vulnerability was recognised subsequently by the CPS, who requested an assessment of the special measures required to assist her in giving evidence in court. The completed assessment contained all of the necessary information. A special measures assessment was not required for the fourth vulnerable victim or witness. Although this involved an 8-year-old vulnerable victim, the police anticipated that the defendant would plead guilty at the first court hearing and there would be no need for a trial.

Vulnerability-related case study

Case study

While at school an 8-year-old child said that his mother had beaten him with a belt and that there had been previous incidents. The boy had no visible injuries but the police and social services were correctly notified and the boy's mother arrested. When interviewed she admitted to hitting her son with a belt leaving a red mark but defended herself by saying that her son was being naughty and she considered her response to be 'lawful chastisement'.

Due to his young age the boy was vulnerable and the police should have undertaken a video interview with him in order to obtain his evidence in relation to this and the allegations of previous assaults. This video could then be played to the court so that the victim would not be subject to the added pressure of a court appearance. This is one of a number of measures available to allow vulnerable victims or witnesses to give their best evidence. No such interview was recorded. There was no record of the police making any medical enquiries regarding previous incidents.

Because of the aggravating background of the case (child abuse) the police are required to refer the matter to the CPS for advice so that they can decide on the most appropriate charge. The police did not seek the advice of the CPS and charged the defendant with assault.
